Rugby Feet: Taste of Fortune: MM novelette (Arousing Euphoria Book 9)

Throughout the month of September, the thirty-three conscripted individuals working in the mine received sixty-nine litres of sugar cane brandy and rations of tobacco, beans, and manioc flour for their labour. In January of a larger group of fifty-five forced labourers received some litres of aguardente de canaas well as tobacco, in the form of payment. Towards the end of these two items still constituted the wages given to those working in the sulphur mine of Ndombe Grande. As the Governor of Angola put it, in drawing upon the cheap cane brandy to pay the Africans labouring in the mine turned out to be a real bargain for the Royal Treasury and, apparently, kept the workers in a most content state. Portuguese authorities also used imported alcohol as a means of rewarding African political leaders who provided the labour necessary for these types of ventures.
